Men det betyder att - även om såväl SD som jag landar i slutsatsen att migrationen till Sverige behöver minska radikalt - anser det av olika skäl. Något som i sin tur sammanhänger med att vi ser på världen på olika sätt, har olika ideologiska utgångspunkter och visioner för vad som definierar ett gott samhälle. Denna skillnad har vänstern inte velat se - och uppenbarligen är det en och annan i SD-lägret som inte heller velat se den, vilket reaktionerna på DN-intervjun med mig visar."

Translated from Swedish by Google

aliceteodorescu.se/p/nej-jag-ar-i... "Whoever has followed me over the years knows that one of my main ambitions, not least in the role of political editor at GP, has been to widen the corridor of opinion by addressing the legitimate concerns that irresponsible politics have given rise to. To give the bourgeoisie has the upper hand to formulate its own answers, based on its starting points, to the problems that SD highlighted and others admittedly saw but did not dare to ventilate.

Do these recurring texts about crime, declining school results and social vulnerability make me, and others who have described the same events, a Sweden Democrat - which has long been the mantra from the left? No, then I would have joined the Sweden Democrats. This does not mean that SD was wrong in its description of reality, on the contrary, which I formulated in countless texts over the past decade and then accused of having "normalized" the party.

But this means that - even if both the SD and I come to the conclusion that migration to Sweden needs to be radically reduced - we think so for different reasons. Something that in turn is connected to the fact that we look at the world in different ways, have different ideological starting points and visions for what defines a good society. The left did not want to see this difference - and apparently there are some in the SD camp who did not want to see it either, as the reactions to the DN interview with me show."
